 William Elford Leach (1791-1836) made this fundamental contribution to carcinology in the short time that he was active in zoology (between 1813 and 1821). Leach was also important in introducing the continental "natural system of classification" in England, which resulted in a much sounder supraspecific classification. In this paper he does that brilliantly for the Crustacea.

South Atlantic Zooplankton; 2 volumes. xvi, 1706 p., 705 pls, hardbound. Crisp new copy.

The initial chapter of this treatise describes the general biological features of the South Atlantic; distributions of salinity, temperature, nitrate, surface chlorophyll and primary production are given, together with meridional transport and numbers of species. Twenty-nine groups are described, including the following crustacean groups: Ostracoda, Copepoda, Mysidacea, Amphipoda, Euphausiacea and Larval Decapoda (Brachyura).

The general form of each group is described together with methods of sampling. Anatomical details of a group are well illustrated, as are the geographical distributions. Further, some indication is given of biodiversity. Glossaries are provided where needed. Then, a description is given of the orders and genera, and particular species are described. The ultimate reference book on the subject.
