 In the early 1950's Dr Bernard Kettlewell went into the woods with a mission. He believed a black variety of the peppered moth thrived in industrial areas because camouflage on blackened trees protected it from predatory birds. His work became known as 'Darwins missing evidence' and his findings are now firmly embedded in our cultural consciousness. But it appears he may have been wrong. The author reveals the 'intellectual rivalries, petty jealousies, and faulty science behind one of the most famous experiments in the history of evolutionary biology.
