Recherches sur les monstruosités du Brochet observées dans l'oeuf et sur leur mode de production. Premier Memoire. Partie descriptive / Deuxième Mémoire. Partie expérimentale / Deuxième Mémoire. Chapitre deuxième. Résumé des expériences précédentes. Statistique des monstruosités obtenus / Nouvelles recherches sur la formation des premières cellules embryonnaires; 95, 87, 64, 37 p., 2 (1 double-paged), 1 lithographed pls, new cloth (marbled end papers). A complete collection of all his important teratological work. This copy is signed L. Lereboullet and was the personal copy of Lereboullet's son Leon Lereboullet (1842-1914), who was a physician. Rare.

Dominique-Auguste Lereboullet (1804-1865) had begun to make teratological experiments in 1852. He subjected nearly 300,000 pike eggs to such disturbing agents as heat, cold, running water, and brushing, and carefully tabulated his results, noting that neither the fact nor the agent of perturbation had an effect on the number or type of abnormality that occurred. He concluded that abnormalities were most probably inherent in the structure of the germ, rather than caused by outside agents.

Lereboullet divided monsters into two groups (single and double) and seven classes, which he attributed to modifications in the blastodermic thickening and the embryonic bond. He recognized that the thickened edge of the blastoderm—the embryonic ring—gives rise to all embryonic structures and suggested that double monsters develop from two separate points in the blastodermic thickening. For these experiments the Academy awarded Lereboullet the Alhumbert Prize, which he shared with Camille Dareste, although they had arrived at opposite theoretical conclusions.

 In March 1876 Sigmund Freud, a promising young scientist, was awarded a travel grant to pursue a between-semesters research project at the university's zoological research station at Trieste, Italy. His task was to identify the testes of the eel (the so-called Syrski organ described in this paper). He dissected and studied under the microscope 400 eels during the spring of 1876, trying to confirm Syrski's suggestion that a certain small-lobed organ found in immature males (no one had ever found a mature male!) was the missing testes. His analysis of the organ 's structure tended to support Syrski's idea, but he was disappointed that his results were not more conclusive. His professors, however, appreciating his cautious and thorough approach, were favorably impressed. They thought the young biologist would go far.
